Provoking Presentation Brings Global Awareness and Practical Solutions to Reversing Environment's Failing Health
WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 /PRNewswire/ -- Tom Kiser, President of Professional Supply Inc., presented his devastating thoughts on the future of our world to the Ocean Conservancy, the world's foremost advocate for the oceans last week.

Kiser's hour-long presentation describing how we're incrementally destroying the economy, culture, ecology, and our infrastructure brought applause from the audience of world leaders.

"It's time to get serious," stated Kiser. "This isn't new information. It's that we don't see it because people don't remember what clean air and fresh water means anymore."

Kiser's mission was clear to the powerful group -- to create a world of abundant energy with innovative energy systems that reduce costs and eliminate emissions. "There must be a movement to implement those technological innovations that are already available to us," he said.

"Tom had a great way of making clear what a burden our millions of 'chimneys' are putting on our watery planet," said Chris Kuebler, retired Chairman and CEO, Convanche Pharmaceuticals. "We were surprised and very pleased by the critical role we play in absorbing the mess we are putting into our air. I am thrilled he is developing solutions."

Kiser presented a picture of a world dependent on energy with no strategy for the future. He explained to the group that many of us may not see the consequences of failing to act in our lifetime, but the fact of the matter is that unless corrected, it's going to happen. Kiser does have the answers. He proposed that we change the way power plants, manufacturing facilities, and commercial buildings operate. He wants us to develop environmentally friendly energy production habits resulting in zero emissions. He added that this simple act can be accomplished right now.

"The good news about our future is that the solution is available to us. The technology exists," he adamantly declared. "And there's more -- this will result in more energy and elimination of harmful pollutants in our oceans and our world."

"His straight talk was a wake-up call," said Robert Sullivan, Associate Director, Smithsonian Institute National Museum of Natural History. "Practical energy strategies are doable and those strategies will conserve our oceans. We must act now."

Kiser challenged the group to take action today. "True success is a foregone conclusion," he says. "If we work together to create an energy strategy, we can look back and see that the effort we made a difference for us and for our oceans."

"The audience understood the connection between the oceans and energy in their personal and corporate life," said Shari Sant Plummer, Board member of the Ocean Conservancy. "Tom is the kind of guy who can inspire people to act."

Thomas E. Kiser is Chairman, CEO and founder of Professional Supply Inc. (PSI) (<http://www.solarsolutionsbypsi.com>), an international leader in the innovation, design and application of the most advanced heating, ventilating and energy systems in the world. Mr. Kiser, an aeronautical engineer, is a pioneer in the field of energy and has developed many revolutionary patents that have changed the way industries integrate and utilize HVAC. He is famous for the "Kiser Concept" which was installed in the Ford Motor Company and produced 15 million dollars in annual energy savings. It also received an ASHRAE National Energy Savings Award. His concepts and leadership are in high demand as the world struggles to meet the intense energy demands today and in the future. Tom Kiser's energy systems and his energy answers will continue to change the lives of millions of people and radically alter the way companies use energy.
